

Poncian Japhace

Mr Japhace Poncian is a lecturer in Development Studies. He researches on the politics of extractive resource governance and broader development issues in Tanzania and Africa. He holds a BA (Education) from Mkwawa University College of Education (MUCE), a constituent college of the University of Dar es Salaam, an MA in Global Development and Africa from the University of Leeds and is currently pursuing a PhD in Politics at the University of Newcastle in Australia. His current research focuses on the politics of extractive resource governance and how that manifests in the nature of relations between communities and government in decision-making processes in the natural gas sub-sector. He has taught courses in History and Development Studies at MUCE and has held sessional academic position at the University of Newcastle in some undergraduate politics courses. His research outputs have appeared in journals such as the African Review, Development Studies Research, Bandung: Journal of the Global South, etc.